

In November of 2019, in several Facebook Autism groups, I started to notice an influx of new members and an influx of discussion about mental health topics. In the discussion of mental health, the accounts, the symptoms, the descriptions, etc. given by the members was implausible. These people very clearly were not experiencing the problems they claimed to be experiencing.

What has happened here is Wells Fargo has inundated the Autism groups with people to discuss mental health. They do this in an attempt to prod me into speaking about my mental health issues on social media. There have been numerous court rulings stating that anything you disclose on social media, you have no right to privacy to.

Both the increased join rate and the shift in the content of the discussion of the groups are statistically improbable and can be subjected to statistical analysis. In March of 2020, I began to collect data to be used to that end. I did automated searches for Facebook posts. I saved the HTML files. Then I used a web application that I created to extract the data I needed from the HTML files. The data is loaded on a database on my local machine.

In this packet, I have included some sample UI outputs for the publicly available Asperger's Syndrome Awareness and Support Group. The UI outputs have real Facebook data loaded onto a UI that I created. I have also included a zip file with 2 posts from the "High Functioning Autism" group. * Asperger's Syndrome Awareness and Support Group is no longer publicly available.

The pre-scam era is before October to November of 2019. It is around October to November 2019 when this started. The scam era is the time period afterwards. The sample UI outputs give a visual representation of the phenomena I describe. I never fully completed my statistical analysis. You have an influx of users, an influx of posts, and in this influx, they come to (largely) talk about mental health issues other than autism. You can see the comparison from the pre-scam era to the scam era.

If Facebook sees this, I am terribly sorry that I have had to conduct this project. This bank has used your service to violate my rights and terrorize me for now almost 4 years. I have to prove it somehow. I may have uncovered the most grotesque abuse of your service in its history.
