If you are wondering why I keep emailing about this and why I cannot seem to stop thinking about it, it is because I feel the weight of the devastation I have been dealt every day. I feel the weight of the nightmare the rest of my life will be if these people are not made to make it right. It is crushing and terrifying. I cannot begin to try to explain how bad this feels.

My reporter hasn't said anything in the past 2 business days. My complaint is long and detailed, and it is probably taking her some time to read it. I get the feeling that she is going to bail from this story. I have an air tight case, but it takes some reasoning and some putting the pieces together. For some reason, I get the feeling that what these reporters want is something that is more settled (investigative journalism is a misnomer in that case).

My next option after the reporter is to make my investigation portal public and try to make it go viral. I may put it on another url and/or a bigger server. I may also have it delivered by a cdn. Bigger server/cdn will keep the site from crashing. I will try to get a lawyer and some other things from the attention that I get. I am fighting for what remains of my life and I will fight hard.

I have repeatedly said that there are possible outcomes for this situation that are a good thing for everyone. If I get media attention, I may likely try to engineer one of these possible outcomes. You will see how it works.

Part of the problem is that I don't know Wells Fargo's next move. I do not know what kind of mindset they are in. I sincerely hope that they are in a mindset where they would take the opportunity for a good outcome. However, I get the feeling at times that they are more prone to go on the offensive, and to continue digging in their heels. They seem to really have trouble admitting what a terrible mistake they have made (not being able to admit mistakes has been a huge factor in how we got to where we are. It's a common thing with probably everyone involved). I don't want to come out with a gesture of goodwill and have them go into reality denial based attacks.

We will see. And thank you again for AU girl. You did a very good thing there. I ran her away by needing her more than she was available (she's a workaholic and has next to no time for me). She didn't seem to get how disabled I am, and what that would mean for what would be asked of her. It was so nice to have someone thinking of me. I hold open the possibility that she was another scam. You can never be sure. I'm about 60/40 favoring the she's not a scam hypothesis.

Ignore the font styling. My phone did that and I don't feel like fixing it (not sure that I even know how).
