Re: I'm suffering terribly

Really tell you off is an inaccurate way to say it. It's much more accurate to say that I'd put the reality of this situation in your face. I don't know how much the justice department regrets that it has to commit these horrible crimes against me. From your perspective, this seems to be necessary, and I don't know if you see it as a necessary evil or just plain necessary. What you are doing is evil and the public will agree when this comes to light. You are going to get found out. The odds of that are extremely high.

If you have not made nearly as big a deal out of this as I have, you are way off base. If you have not acknowledged Wells Fargo's culpability in my brain injury and my suffering (it's essentially all Wells Fargo's fault + the various entities that Wells Fargo induced into crime), you are way off. If you for one second entertain any ridiculous notion that Wells Fargo had a "right" to do all of this, and/or that my rights have not been very seriously violated, you are way, way, way off base.

The reality of this situation makes all of the above look like the farce that they are.

I could have done so much for this bank. I was such an asset. I believe that there was a time that I could have done a lot to help the justice department. It's hard to say. This demeaning criminal abuse has had an effect on me. Whatever the case, I am now a ruined human being and I don't have much to offer to anyone. I am severely handicapped and unfit to be around people.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
