This may drive you insane and you may wonder why I send you all of this stuff, a lot of it that seems to have nothing to do with you. I am extremely unwell and in constant distress and I don't know who else to talk to. It is a result of what has been done to me. There is also an element of having very little self-control.

I have had a feeling, the entire time that I've had this condition, that if I were to get a brain scan, the doctor would look at the images and come back and say "I've never seen anything like this before." I have had a sense that I am an extraordinary case in some sense. By brain scan I mean a pet scan or another scan that can show the effects of my ptsd.

I'm going to talk to my friend on Twitter and see how badly her brain is broken. I'm going to ask her if normal tasks, like making a can of soup or cleaning house feel like they take an enormous amount of effort, so much that she can't do them to save her life. I haven't read much about ptsd handicapping people the way that it has handicapped me. My friend on Twitter has horrible symptoms. She has flashbacks and she has described them to me and it is horrifying to hear.

I am dying from being treated as if I do not matter. That's how I feel and have felt for years. I feel like a man who is dying.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
