Re: My disparager

"I have a quality of naïveté, where I do not see the viciousness in people. I overestimate their desire to do right and their concern about their conduct, and the underestimate their tendency to be unfair to others."

-for one example, I have done this with you. I send you audios where I am begging for help and where I also give you information about what I'm doing. I do this as you are engaging in ongoing crime against me. The information I give is useful for anyone who seeks to criminally victimize me, and I give it to you anyways. I trust you for no reason. I believe in your humanity and that you care about me, also for no reason.

What I mean when I say that I don't see the viciousness in others, I'm speaking of the more benign kind of viciousness that almost everyone has. Viciousness is never really benign, but you have to distinguish this from the viciousness of different types of violent people, like murderers and power hungry men.

What I am speaking of is a slight viciousness, that is nowhere as pronounced as that of those types of people. It is the nature of people to do things like to be dishonest, or to put up a facade, or to deliberately screw over other people, or to stab people in the back, to be pushy and aggressive with their goals, and to in general be out for their own interests in life and to play dirty when they have to or when they can get away with it. I do not have this variety of viciousness, and this can make me blind to its existence in others.

What's funny is that sometimes this naive attitude will bring out the best in people. They can tell that I don't sense their viciousness and the viciousness of others, and they will be somewhat amused by this. At the same time, it's like my desire to be fair with them and to see the best in them inspires them to be a better version of themselves. They will be fair with me and keep screwing over everyone else. It's like they only play dirty in life because they feel like they have to because of everyone else. I can't think of a specific example at the moment, at least not one that I can narrate and explain, and this is just because I'm feeling lazy. It is a very familiar experience. It's etched in my mind, independent of any one specific instance.

The not trusting people component comes out in my interactions with others, at least that's one place. I am wary of giving people information that can be used against me. There are a few other elements of this lack of trust. This thing about giving people information can be a symptom of paranoid personality disorder, but I don't think that's the case with me. It is me, again, being rational. I'm wary about giving such info, that can be used against me, because people will reliably use it against me. I am someone who has been opposed by something not far from everyone that I have encountered in life. If they haven't opposed me yet, that don't mean that they won't ever. I pretty well understand why I am opposed so consistently and with such a lack of inhibition. It's not a mystery at all. It is a difficult circumstance to have in life, however.

Then there is the fact that, when I meet someone, if the first thing that I do is to tell myself "one day, not too far from today, I will be a massive liability for this person", I'm going to be right not all that much less than 100% of the time. Why do I want to give information that can be used against me to someone who is going to be facing prison time because of me? What are the chances that they capitalize on this information?

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
