I'm getting some of my strength back. I'm able to work a little bit every day, or at least I have been for the past several days. some days are better than others.

I hate this situation that we're in. I wish that I could be made whole and life could be made worth living on a smaller amount of money. This assumed that Wells Fargo has any interest in making this right. In that situation, I could make an offer to settle for something that they would call "immaterial." The bank would not have to disclose many details about what happened and there would be no need for me to be publicly known. I'm just guessing when I say that the bank won't have to disclose many details. I assume that this is how it works when things are "immaterial."

We have several problems with this. One is that no amount of money that could be called immaterial to any company is going to compensate for what has happened to me. Anything less than a billion dollars, I will for sure want to die. I will probably want to die at a billion dollars and probably would want to for many times that.

Then we have another major problem that relates to Wells Fargo's reality denial. In that exercise, Wells Fargo has character assassinated me. They have told the people at Bank of America and elsewhere that I am a psychopath. They have almost certainly told members of congress some similar garbage. This necessitates that I defend myself. These character assassinations and disparaging me over my mental history has destroyed my life. I came to Charlotte to escape this, and this bank destroyed my new life and all the hopes that I could have had. What I wanted so badly to escape, they have amplified 10 million decibels.

I am getting so pissed off that I can't type any more of this. I want there to be a hell for the people who did this to me to burn in. That is my ultimate wish.

Clint Williams
