

Leonard Clinton Williams III [REDACTED]@gmail.com>

Jun 29th, 2023, 12:30 PM

Re: Email for June 2, 2023

To: "Division, Criminal (CRM)" <Criminal.Division@usdoj.gov>, civil.feedback@usdoj.gov

I need medical care that is extremely expensive, to document my impairment with the social security administration. If she doesn't pay me back, I won't be able to afford it. DDS is fairly likely to cut my benefits for the future, the next time they review my case. This is because that the documentation of my impairment is kind of weak, according to their rules. I experience impairment and I report it to my different doctors. They record it on the healthcare records that they prepare for my file, which will go to DDS. What DDS will then have is an account of my impairment that is barely better than me just calling them up and telling them about it. I need something objective, namely a brain scan and neuropsychological testing. Brain scan is out of the budget at current, but neuropsychological testing will also document my impairment objectively.

I have reported to my current provider a 700% improvement in my condition, since we started working together. This is accurate but could give the wrong impression. The reason I give a figure of 700%, and I do kind of just wing that figure, is that before he gave me my medication back and did some other things to help me, all I did all day is suffer like a terminally ill person. It was nonstop, horrific suffering that never went away for as much as 1 second. I suffered like this for 273 consecutive days. My suffering would go down at certain times, but never went away and was absolutely horrific at all times.

If you go back in time to when I had my medication, a time at which I was still profoundly disabled, my improvement at the current time is probably more like 10% or 20%. It is a big difference but I'm still not anywhere near capable of going to work.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams

(980)-[REDACTED]