"If I get totally railroaded here, I won't be the first person to suffer that fate. So in that sense, I should count myself lucky with anything more than getting totally railroaded."

-this probably really resonates with you and might sound like I'm preaching some gospel to the choir. I should lower my expectations or not be so mad, and think of the people who have it far worse.

If that's your reaction, there's possibility a hint of truth in there. I will add that the people who are far worse off than me is a number that gets smaller and smaller as time goes on. What percentage of people are permanently disabled? That's one valid question to ask, to narrow the field. I don't know that many people who suffer like I do. I don't know a single one, actually.

Here, however, is the elephant in the room, that everyone in the room cannot seem to see, under any conditions or in any scenario-how many times, in the past hundred years, have the people running Wells Fargo been railroaded? When were they screwed over, spit on, or left in the dust? Why does not the above analysis apply to them, ever, not even once in 100 years, no matter what they do? When it is Wells Fargo's turn to get railroaded? When will it be kosher for the people who run this bank's wants, needs, and desires to be compromised in any slightly material way?

How many people are less fortunate than the people who run Wells Fargo? Should not the people at Wells Fargo be satisfied with having just barely more than the worst possible outcome? Can you name one since occurrence of such, in the past 100 years?

They seem to very obviously be much more obstinate and also infinitely more possessed of feelings of entitlement than me. This could have been over with a simple conversation. That's all I asked for, for over a year. Then, for now 4 years, I have been making offers that split the pie very unevenly and in their favor, and they don't take a single one of them. They want the whole pie, down to the last crumb, and they will settle for nothing less.

Clint Williams
