I can't remember when I started on this letter, but as of now I'm on page 24. This is single spaced. When I am not impaired, I can write this extremely fast. It is largely because these are thoughts that have accumulated in my head over a good sized time period. There is no creativity involved. I don't have to think much at all about what I am going to write.

Another factor is that I am a very fast writer in any context. This is especially before I became disabled. I used to write Jenny's sermons. Sometimes it would be more me giving her corrections and ideas, and sometimes I would write very large sections of the sermon that would be included close to verbatim. There was one in particular that really sticks out in my mind. Jenny had been working on it for hours and hours and hours. She was panicking because nothing that she could come up with sounded good to her. She emailed me the sermon at about 1 am. It was a wreck. I asked her what the topic was supposed to be, and she explained it to me. I just said "here" and with her sitting on the phone with me, I typed her a complete sermon, with just a few things left for her to add. It took me about 30 minutes to write it from scratch. I formatted it as a bulleted list of sections. She then did our typical thing where she takes my suggestions and what I wrote back to the drawing board. She will add her own stuff and reword some of what I provided.

This particular sermon was important, because her pastor wanted her to write something that would convince the very stubborn elders of the church to agree to a buyout from a larger ministry. I think I have that right. It was the only way the church would survive financially, but they needed votes and these people wouldn't budge. Our sermon worked. The stubborn people lost their stubbornness. I am like my madman cousin. I'm charismatic in my preaching.
