I beat you people to death. The way to get me to not beat you to death is to stop doing cruel things to me, like running your trap to my little woman. I have no mercy on you, because you have no mercy on me. You have no mercy on me, because you have failed to have mercy on yourself. You have made a mistake. You have made a lot of mistakes. You have went into a mode of denying reality, to avoid admitting that you have made a mistake. It is this state of denying reality that makes you act the way that you do. You fight and fight and fight against reality, and the stakes continually go up.

There are all kinds of reasons to have mercy on yourself. You are only human. My healthcare records will confuse you. This is a hard situation for you to deal with. We are, at least as you see it, up against the end of the world. It is ok to just admit that you made a mistake and to have mercy on yourself for making it. The rest of the world will have mercy on you, because all of those people also know what it's like to only be human. It is easy for people to have mercy on you for making a mistake. It is not so easy to get people to have mercy on you for being cruel to a handicapped person.

I come across as a real hard ass in a lot of these emails. It can be misleading. When I ride in a car, I panic constantly. If it's at night, I will sometimes lose control and start to scream curse words as loud as I can. When I go to the bar to get chicken tenders, I sometimes tremble when I talk to others. I start thinking that I need weapons, sometimes, when I'm walking down the sidewalk at the complex where the bar is at. I constantly anticipate someone coming from some direction and belittling or harassing me. I feel threatened and think to myself that I need to never come here again without bringing a hunting knife. I never bring a hunting knife. I know better than to put myself at risk like that. But once I get there, that's what I think.

You have destroyed a human being for absolutely no reason, and you need to cut your losses.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
