"I don't like making myself out as being more than other people."

-this may not jive with how you see me. The fact that I talk to the people like you, who seem to think so well of themselves, like they're garbage- this might lead you to think that I think so highly of myself. I do think highly of myself but not in a way that I am better than anyone else.

I talk to you like you're garbage because you are. I intended to explain this in my letter. I may get back on my letter at some point soon. There is no one who is above getting told exactly what I think of them. If the United States Department of Justice is a pack of depraved conmen and liars, I will tell them to their face that they're a pack of depraved conmen and liars. I'll put the truth in your faces too, no matter how comforting your lies are to you.

I judge people on how good they are at perceiving and discerning reality. This ends up with me not thinking that there are many people above me. No one is exactly below me either, even though the majority of people cannot perceive and discern reality with the acuity that I can.

I have no awe and reverence for people who hold office in some high up place or who have otherwise acquired some status or prestige. I have nothing against them either, not by default. I am typically very happy for them and their success. I look at them and I want them to be happy, and I feel like I want to help them, if I ever can. But people who are in high up places are quite often out to lunch in what they believe. Their understanding of the world is inaccurate and often kind of feeble. I spot this pretty readily and it makes them seem all too human.

It doesn't bother me, but in the case they do get in a debate or an argument with me, I'll tell them that they're dead wrong and I'll tell them why. I'll put it into plain terms how ridiculous what they think is. I'll never concede that they're right unless they are. They may be shocked that Leonard Clinton Williams III would contend with someone so high and mighty as them. Who do I think that I am, to challenge (insert whoever the big shot is). That's what they think. I am a humble human being who is good at seeing this as they are, and who is also conscious of his ignorance in the vast number of places where it exists. In most of these vast places, my ignorance outweighs my knowledge. It is not typical of people to think like this.

A tendency inherent in ordinary human nature is to be given to a false sense that we understand things. Something that is very complex is put in front of our face, and we feel qualified to opine on it, to make judgements. We have a subjective sense, a feeling, that we understand it. It is a feeling that is automatic. It never occurs to us that there might be some relevant knowledge that we don't yet have.

I am much, much less given to this than others. I believe that it is partly due to my being autistic. I have a profound impairment in my intuition. It is an impairment that just happens to double as a gift. The fact that my intuition malfunctions seems to get in the way of me thinking that I understand something that I do not.

I am murdered from typing this and can't do any more.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
