"Something that is very complex is put in front of our face, and we feel qualified to opine on it, to make judgements."

-here you are thinking that this is an unfamiliar experience for you. You don't readily recall any time when someone put something very complex in front of you and you felt like you understood it. You do this all the time, most likely. Most people do. For sure you've done it 100 times in your life, probably closer to 1,000.

It is the way that this works. Complex things are the definition of things that are hard to understand, in how you think. When I speak of things that are complex, it brings to your mind all of the things that you found hard to understand, and none of the things that you found easy to understand.

What I'm telling you, is that in the latter category, of things you found easy to understand, there are a lot of very complex things that you don't actually understand. These complex things didn't seem complex to you but they were. You felt like you understood them but this feeling was an illusion.

My healthcare records were one such thing. You look at those and think all sorts of horrible and completely untrue things about me. Wells Fargo's spiel that I'm "dangerous" seems to add up. What never occurs to you is that, to be qualified to opine on those records, the way that the doctors at the hospital opined on them, you would have to go to school a minimum of 12 years. It is 8 years of med school followed by 4 years of training in psychiatry. These 12 years of education and training qualify you to be a beginner as a psychiatrist. When you first made your judgments of me, based on those records, did you do it with the level of confidence and certainty of someone who is more than a beginner?

Or did you hedge your bets, and leave open the possibility that I might be a really kindhearted man? Hedging your bets would seem appropriate, as you actually know nothing about the subject matter in front of you. But I'd say the odds are that you didn't hedge your bets the least. You were 12 years of brutal coursework and training shy of being a beginner, and yet there you go, making judgements with the competency of a seasoned vet.

The doctors at this hospital, and the doctors I saw after that, they are each more than a beginner, most often far more than a beginner. They correctly did determine that I am a very kindhearted man.

Let me dumb it down for you. You are law enforcement. You tell the world that you enforce the rule of law. Those healthcare records are smoking gun evidence of a very serious crime. Title 18 US Code will have it listed and you surely knew about this. This is something that you are more than a beginner at. For future reference, you'll want to arrest people that obtain people's healthcare records like this and then waltz into your office to show them to you.

You have done it this time. I try to think of you and then you do this to me.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
