If a Wells Fargo CEO walked into a shareholders meeting with an AK-47 and killed every shareholder in the room, what would you do? How many years in prison would you give the victims' families? I don't know how many people fit in the room where they hold shareholders meeting. Say it's 500. I don't feel like doing the math. What is $$750 * 500$? That's the going rate for a felony committed by Wells Fargo in broad daylight.

If a Wells Fargo CEO murdered 500 people out of the sight of the public, you'd scurry like hell to hide the bodies. Then, out of your commitment to making sure this bank doesn't have to pay single cost of its actions, you'd extort a children's home to get funds to pay the burial expenses. Wells Fargo is good at rigging the game. You are good at taking the easiest way out possible, by means of kicking the shit out of the weakest people in the room. You're a big bully. I'm good at doing the right thing, at rising to the occasion, at making the world a better place, and at being right. I can and will defend this statement to the entire world. Who is the good guy here? Who is the dangerous one? Who is about as impressive as a pool of vomit?

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
