I need to focus on getting money from the people on the other side. There is practically nothing that I can do for money. I've got a friend that I help with his web applications from time to time. I made $72 last year and $750 in the few years before that. I think that I made it in one single year. The company that he works for paid me to do some work on their website. I got $500 for helping them with a script and then I got $250 for an additional 2 hours of work. That's the highest rate that I've ever been paid, and it was because he felt sorry for me. He understands my limitations and we're never on a deadline.

If I am to make money, I need things that require the absolute least interaction with others as is possible. One idea I have is writing an extension to PayPal's SDK, and then selling it to PayPal once it is done. PayPal's API has the appearance of being put together hastily during the startup phase, when the company had to do what it could to get off of the ground. They could get a lot of capitalized value from an extension to their sdk.

If I do this, I would be writing code for probably a year or more. The extension that I would make would be for the orders API, not any of their other ones. But I'd write code for a year or 18 months or maybe more, and I'd only have to talk to people at the end of it. I cannot deal with daily interactions with people. It is hard enough talking to them once a year or 18 months.

I could make some learning courses, but that would take me forever, and I'd have to deal with customers. I might do it though. I feel helpless when I think of trying to work. It's like I just can't do it.
