I'm starting a new chain because that last one has devolved into spinning for minutes at a time, when I press send. It is because of the long message that I typed and maybe something else.

" Then, in terms of specificity, if I'm around people for a length of time, I will develop an intuitive sense of how they think that is tailored to them. "

- it's not like I know their every thought, but people are a part of nature, and nature is a machine. There are patterns in nature. That is why we can use math to explain and to predict the movements of planets, for example. People's thoughts and behaviors and the things that they say are driven by something, and that something, whatever it is, does things systematically. Nothing is completely meaningless. There is no uncaused cause, and there is no thought or behavior that emanates from absolutely nothing . When you get a sense of how these systematic processes distort what a person says, what they do, and how they think, you can get especially good at picking them apart. I don't want to overstate this case either, and I don't know why I'm telling you this.
