I am getting really tired and have been worthless for awhile. I'm looking at my class files for my menu builder. I can't help but wonder what a veteran programmer would think of it. It gets the job done and is maintainable. I am not aware of any design principle that it violates, and principles are just guidelines anyways. I don't know every principle by heart either.

What I am doing, over time, is building a framework that is specialized for my use case. It is designed for people (like me) who buy hand coded UIs and make them dynamic. My framework is different, in that it places no constraints whatsoever on what you can do with your website.

When you get Wordpress and buy a Wordpress theme, it's like buying a condo and choosing how to decorate it. You're pretty fixed in, with what you are going to have. Your choices are limited.

What I do is build everything from scratch, even if that means I buy something that someone else built from scratch and make it part of my project. It is like having raw land, to build anything you want, completely customized. No limitations at all. You are not limited by whatever plug-in comes closest to doing what you need to do.

I could never do this for money again. I am too slow and I can't deal with people at all. Still yet, I approach it like I'm doing it for a living, even as I make progress at a snail's pace. I want my stuff to be top notch.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
