"I get extremely mad thinking about this. I'm getting something, according to what I have proposed, but it's still a massive injustice and it bothers me very badly that these people will get away with this."

- I've already said this one or more times- the whole idea of putting this on the national and international stage is absolutely insane. It would be a requisite step in getting me true justice, but when I think of it, it's freaking crazy. I'm going to get in front of a crowd, with a big announcement on TV, perhaps people from the justice department standing beside me- ...to address this liability, Wells Fargo paid 2 crisis counselors to create a set of deliberately falsified healthcare records. These records contained a fabricated account of me suffering from symptoms of serious mental illness. The purpose of these records was to portray my belief that Wells Fargo invaded my privacy out to be a symptom of my mental health condition....(skipping ahead) acting under the direction of Wells Fargo, the group of coconspirators subjected me to an unlawful, false pretense civil commitment process, which was in fact a series of kidnappings and false imprisonments carried out under the guise of a civil commitment.

And it would just go on and on. It's crazy and I'm not sure if I'd be happy to see this happen or not. Part of me would be happy, I think, because it would be me getting real justice, but I'd also be feeling, I don't know how to describe it, I guess like "why are we doing this." I am likely to die over this. That's part of the picture.

I get the sense, sometimes, that you really care about your agency and about your mission and your values. When I think of you in those terms, I have mercy on you in my mind, because you seem like people who can be hurt. Your conduct towards me doesn't reflect well on you, and maybe it bothers you at times. Maybe it amplifies your self-doubts, about who you really are. Everyone has self-doubts and it can be painful. I can't type anymore.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
