I talk to you like you're garbage. I hit you with the worst criticisms, and I characterize you in ways that are the complete opposite of flattering. I do all of this sometimes. I would hope that you find this reasonable and something that it is ok for you to tolerate, given what you've done to me and the condition that I am in. Everything about this situation screams for the need to have mercy on me.

I also understand that the things I say can be hard to hear. I hit people where it hurts, when I get mad. There is also, I think, a slight effect of me being a bully and/or having unreasonably high standards. With the latter, I mean that it may feel like, to you, that I disregard the fact that you are just a human being. With being a bully, it is a pretty frequent thing, as of the past several years, where I will have this vague sense that there's something unfair about the way that I treat people. In thinking this, it has something to do with my being capable. Those are the terms that I think in. And maybe bully isn't the best way to describe it. But it's like I'm very capable in certain domains, and I'm also intense and a perfectionist. I can't type any more.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
