Part of it was that she (or whoever it was) argued with me. You people need to do better. It's like you have this idea that you're going to cheat your way to some baseline, and from there you will be able to start playing fair. Your business is broken and you are scurrying to save it from the inevitable damage that will result from this brokenness. That's one idea that I have that would explain the way you act. Part of your process there is to avoid telling the world that you are broken. It's like you've got to hide this reality long enough to patch it up, until it's no longer broken. Then there will be no reality to hide. In all of this, you behave very dishonestly and in a very self-centered way.

Then the Justice Department seems to be telling itself that they need to give you impunity just a little bit longer. They need to give the bank impunity this one last time, or maybe just 5 more times, and this will correct itself. One day, the Justice Department can take off the training wheels or take back the crutches, and start doing everything business as usual. It sounds like something that won't work to me. You are criminal law enforcement. Can you tell me of a single instance when this model, of holding person b accountable for person a's crimes, has ever altered person a's behavior, when person a has a track record that indicates that person a is some combination of completely immoral and totally out of control?
