My sleep has gotten turned around again. Now it's on to this terrible process of getting back to what I like. When my mother is in here, it is torment. When she's awake and moving around and doing stuff, the torment is amplified about 500x. When she's in here and she's asleep, it's mainly just a tax on my mind. When she's moving around, cooking, talking on the phone, it is pure hell. She offered to make some mashed potatoes earlier. It is store bought ones that you just heat up. She was originally going to heat up some beans to go with them. The process that ensued drove me absolutely insane. It was total torment. I told her to please just make the potatoes and not worry about the beans. More hell ensued following that. The potatoes weren't worth it, and I wish she would have just not said anything about it to me. I have to tell her over and over to not talk to me. The lesson that I don't need to be talked to, ever, never sticks.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
