It hasn't ceased for long. It was going strong until an hour or two. I'm a kindhearted and ethical man with good intentions. Any perceptions to the contrary, you need to get rid of.

Wells Fargo does far better with 99.9997% of its employees, in terms of acting ethically and treating people fair. They were very good to me for quite some time.

The Justice Department does far better on every single other thing that you do or have done.

You've screwed up on me, majorly, both of you. But you still have your much larger collection of successes and exemplary treatment of others. You need to just accept this defeat, meaning you have failed here and that's just that. You have failed to live up to your highest ideals. I get the sense, at times, that your sense of self is overly tied up with this matter with me. If that's the case, it's easy to see how someone will want to dig their heels in and have trouble accepting reality.

I suggest you derive your sense of self from the other 99.9997% of your dealings with others. That will free you up to have mercy on yourself in regards to this matter with me. No one bats 1.000. Even the greatest successes will have one or two dramatic failures. This has repeatedly mushroomed and it's just a crazy situation.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
