"disabled, dying man"

-I'm a bit bolder than your typical disabled, dying man, but that doesn't change the reality of the situation. I am who I am, and I will most likely be that person up to and through the very last minute. I am not the least bit scared to tell you the truth, as I see it. I don't recall ever having been, and I don't think I ever will be. I do not respect titles and prestige, in that way. My facts are every bit as good as your facts, and the facts of the matter favor me. This is in moral terms.

My life is more defensible than yours, almost certainly, and within the context of the situation with me, the bank, and the people in the government, there is no question. It is extremely lopsided, and you will not get away with the next thing any more than you got away with the last thing. Why do my good gestures get responded to in this way?

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
