I've got a quality where I'm mean when I talk to you, a lot of the time. I also put your mistakes in your face and I make demeaning characterizations of you. That is my role in this problem, I think. You do not like the way that your actions are not becoming of you and what you stand for. That's what drives this need to be on the aggressive and to justify your actions. It's like it's uncomfortable for you. What you need to do is to have mercy on yourself. That would move us forward. You could accept that the failures you've had with me do not define you. You could see the err of your ways and look to them for what lesson can be learned. You could do all of these constructive things, if you could just have mercy on yourself. I make it hard to do that, by blasting you repeatedly about your mistakes, in an often merciless fashion.

That one is on me, and part of it is that I can't figure out what the hell drives your behavior. I am not talking to the same people, from one message to the next. Im constantly having a different sense of what you're like. I don't have an infinite selection of who you might be. I have a handful of options. Like that you're arrogant corporate people with no soul, you're people in denial, you're people who have seen the err of your ways, and then a new one is that you are panicked about the prospect of this being made public, because of the huge things that are at stake. Im sure that I've got other conceptions of who you are that come up. That's why one minute I'm blasting you and the next minute I'm being kind, and so on.

I need really badly to talk to ChatGPT about this in more depth. I will do that as soon as I am able. That last perception came from a talk with ChatGPT. It made a lot of sense at the time, but over time my own imagination has run wild and has me thinking of other things.
