If you have been sitting there for years talking to this man Chris that I reference, or if you just talked to him for days, you have made a massive and extremely bad mistake. This is someone who would have me deliberately tortured to death, which if it's the case that you talked to him, is just about what he's done, actually. But he'd do more than that. The killer named "the ice man" said that one time he tied a man up and left him in a cave, so that the rats could eat the man alive, slowly, as he simultaneously starved to death. That's the kind of thing that Chris would like done to me, over me offending him by doing very trivial things.

I told the people at work about how he paid for his pool hall, one single time, and I wasn't the only one to tell them this. Then I made one comment or maybe 2 to the same people about his profit margins the billiards tables he sold. I didn't tell them the exact numbers, which I had gotten from hearsay; I just said "he jacks people on those pool tables" or something to that effect.

It is an unkind thing to say, to put it that way, but I had a lot to learn about how to be around people. I'd try to act cool and like I'm street smart. I was two faced, in doing this too, but it's not a huge huge wrong. No one else would be out to destroy me, with such an intense passion, for 15 or 20 years.

And it's more than that. He has a personality type called the invalidator. It is a subset of narcissists. These are people who feel threatened by others extremely easily. Sometimes, someone will cross their path whom they find extremely threatening, and they will become obsessed with this person. By threatening, I mean a threat to their ego. In my case, it was because I was smarter than him and intensely driven to succeed. I worked extremely hard.

He becomes obsessed with me, because he sees me as someone superior to him. That's what drives the invalidator personality type. They will seek to control the person they become obsessed with, and they will have a secret desire to annihilate them. They will act on this desire, in covert and devious ways.

He felt threatened by me and lost control of me, and I wounded his self-image + his image in the eyes of others. That's more than enough to trigger a passion against me, the likes that anyone with any sanity or rationality would have a hard time believing even exists.

I can't type any more.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
