"In many settings, this creates an illusion of someone who has no autism related impairments."

- the illusion is not strong enough to bypass detection by people who have extensive experience dealing with autistic people. For those people, it is very hard to hide. Pretty much impossible to hide, over any significant period of time. It is also setting dependent. There are many settings where it is blatantly obvious. Like I had a friend I talked to at her job at a gas station for a long time. I'd go up the road to get food, in the middle of the night, and she'd be working. I might talk to her for 1 or 2 hours at a time. It was very obvious to her that I was different, and when I told her that I thought that I might have Asperger's disorder, it made sense to her. Following the first time that I told her, there was a brief period that I went back on my conclusion and decided that I didn't have Asperger's disorder. I told her this, and she strongly contended with me. Once she had the concept of that condition and saw how it explained my peculiarities, it seemed to be something that was extremely obvious to her.

Warmest Regards,
