It's also different in text. The main thing that comes out there is how I tend to be literal and blunt. When I am typing, I am doing something that is closer to what other people do when they're typing, I think. And that would make sense, because typing is an artificial behavior. It is something that is learned, not something that has innate, specialized brain structures dedicated to it.

The difference is much bigger, between me and others, when I am talking.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
