"I will either build a script on the fly, and use it, or I will use some preexisting script that I have built in the past. I am like an actor who goes about life reading scripts, but I do it for the purposes of trying to get across what I am doing, feeling, or thinking. This is not what others do."

- I am so good at this that next to no one, excepting experts with a high level of acuity, can tell that I'm doing this. Not in most situations. It is especially hard to tell in certain environments where I will have the qualities of charm and charisma. These would seem to be mutually exclusive, to most people, I think.

This bit gets complicated, and it is an example of a general theme about me and my personality. I seem to simultaneously possess many sets of qualities that would seem to be mutually exclusive, or at the very least contradictory. Socially awkward and charismatic is one such set of traits. Egocentric and having a strong desire to help other people. That's another one. A recluse who loves people. That doesn't make sense but that's me exactly. Full of fears and yet fearless. This doesn't seem to add up, but that's me too.

I am excessively scared of snakes and spiders, relative to the typical person. I am afraid of heights. I become paralyzed or almost paralyzed, if I'm up on some place that is above the ground and doesn't have anything that would stop you from falling off. But things that scare other people do not scare me. I am given to bravery and boldness in contexts where others cower.

I can't type any more.
