My dad was a nonconformist. He had a moral boldness about him, at times. It was like his own torment allowed him to understand the pain of others, that he otherwise had very little innate capacity to experience. There were times when a kindness in his heart would come to the surface. He was almost completely unconstrained by any concern for what others thought of him. People who lack this constraint are what you would find in the underground railroads or in the homes where people helped Jews hide from the Nazis. Dad could be one of those people, for brief periods of time.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
