This is what I submitted to get that answer:

Yes the despair is a product of the impairment. The impairment creates a feeling of despair. It is like my brain has to work way too hard in everything, and this over-exertion, over-exhaustion, and eventual burning out, with me not being able to do a task in front of me, has some kind of physical effect on my brain structures. It is like what I experience as despair is actually a physical pain experienced by my neurological structures.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
