It seems to me that the best solution is for me to become part of the process of managing this situation. I have an interest in this and so do you, and we need to have a uniform direction and plan. As long as we're on two different pages, there will be friction in handling this and it will be messy and frustrating.

I would really like for the Justice Department to help my friend on Twitter. This is particularly the case if we have to scale down my settlement amount. I don't think I'm being excessive at all, in estimating a $2 million cost for a private investigation. That will take a chunk out of me.

I may be able to do the Justice Department some favors in the future too. I have some unique abilities. One that comes to mind is that I am extremely good at picking up on signs that people are guilty or not guilty of crimes they are accused of. I can do this based on very little information. I just need to see them talk about it. Sometimes I can spot signs of obvious guilt in a 45 seconds or less clip of the person talking. It wouldn't pass in court, not unless we did some kind of test that validated the accuracy of my ability, but I could give you a direction to go that you could bank on. I could tell you who is the right suspect to pursue.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
