I've been kind of wrong in how I deal with this. I have a handicap in social situations, and this is a social situation. My behavior probably seems completely out there to you, and that's no accident, if that is the case. I am just being who I naturally am, and I don't know how to be much different than that. This is especially the case when I am all wound up. My deficit in self-control plays a role too.

What I'm thinking is that I haven't been constructive or acknowledged the basic goodness of the people on the other end, at least not enough and not consistently. I need you to help me, and I have said mean things and talked to you and about you in the worst terms, as I have needed that. I don't know how else to be, because I just am that way. I don't have much ability to plan and to think about how to go about this, due to my handicap. Then my suffering hits me all of the time. It makes me that much more volatile and it makes it that much harder for me to censor what I say.

This situation can be made into something good.
