What would work out in Wells Fargo's favor would be an outcome in which people could feel confident that, if Wells Fargo committed a crime against them, they could report that crime without being subjected to a years long campaign of terror and having their private medical information viewed by banking regulators.

In your quest to make Wells Fargo look like it has done something right, when the actual situation is that it has done horrible, horrible, inexcusable wrongs, the lesson you are teaching people is don't do business with Wells Fargo.
