Step 1, for you, I think, is for you to understand that you have committed crimes and could somewhat fairly be called criminals. In my view, it is not appropriate to call people criminals based on them having committed crimes. It is similar to calling someone a liar because they have told a limited number of lies. The word liar connotes a persistent feature of one's life and one's character, not individual incidents that take place in a broader context of being honest and ethical.

It may be fair though, to call every single person on the other side a criminal, serious and dangerous criminals at that. I do not see any striving in you. I do not see a pattern of sustained effort to take the moral high ground. My personal pattern and long established trend of striving seems to be the polar opposite of how the people at the bank, who preside over these scams, go about life.
