"Will it take 100 more years, or will we send the end of industrial civilization in 10 years? It is absolutely horrifying."

- it won't be gone in 10 years, I don't think. I do think it is possible that the writing will be on the wall in that timeframe, such that no one who is sane can deny what we have coming. It will be a rapidly developing state of chaos. That's what we have for certain, in some time frame, if things don't change.

I want to build a model of the earth's systems and the economy. If I build a model that captures every small detail of how this system works, I believe it is possible, and somewhat likely, that in the process I will discover some way to address the breakdown. There has to be something in there, somewhere, that we can use to artificially create a feedback loop. Have some runaway process in which heat is absorbed and not reflected back into the atmosphere, for example, or have heat taken out of the oceans in some way.

Warmest Regards,

Clint Williams
